Abstract: Using a multi-stage filtering procedure based on both algorithms and human judgement, we develop a Chinese Financial Sentiment Dictionary (CFSD) with the hope to help advance textual analysis of Chinese documents in accounting and finance. There are 1,489 negative words and 1,108 positive words in the CFSD. We translate all 2,597 words into English. We also briefly discuss two unique settings in which researchers can investigate some important and interesting research questions that are rarely studied due to lack of data.

Key words: textual analysis; sentiment analysis; Chinese financial sentiment dictionary

I. Introduction

Textual analysis is a surging field in accounting and finance. Most studies in this area rely on textual information in the English language. Few studies examine large-sample textual data in Chinese, the most spoken language in the world. The linguistic characteristics of Chinese are drastically different from those of English. The thinking patterns between Chinese and English native speakers also differ significantly⁵.

Sentiment analysis is an important aspect of textual analysis. It attempts to measure the sentiment or tone of a financial document, by counting the number of words associated with a particular sentiment word list scaled by the total number of words in the document.

For researchers, the first step in the process of sentiment analysis is to decide which dictionary should be used. Four different English word lists/dictionaries have been extensively used by researchers: Henry (2008), Harvard's GI, Diction, and Loughran and McDonald (2011, hereinafter LM)⁶. It seems that the LM lists have become predominant in more recent studies (Kearney and Liu, 2014). Due to the unique linguistic characteristics of Chinese, we cannot translate the LM word list directly into Chinese and use it for analyzing Chinese documents.

There are three commonly used Chinese sentiment classification dictionaries: HOWNET, DLUTSD, and NTUSD. Similar to Harvard's GI and Diction, all three dictionaries are all for general use rather than for business usage. Loughran and McDonald (2011) warn that researchers attempting to measure sentiment in business communications should not use classification schemes derived outside the domain of business usage. Instead, word lists designed specifically for business communication should be used to measure the sentiment of business text (Loughran & McDonald 2016).

To the best of our knowledge, there is not a sentiment dictionary in Chinese available for business research. To fill this gap, we develop a Chinese Financial Sentiment Dictionary (CFSD) in this paper with the hope to advance textual analysis of

II. Construction of CFSD

We first create a basic dictionary using HOWNET, DLUTSD and NTUSD and then use online roadshow transcripts, earnings conference call transcripts, IPO prospectus reports, and annual reports to create a basic corpus. Using a multi-stage filtering procedure based on both algorithms and human judgement, we finally create CFSD. The complete process is described in detail as follows.

- Step 1: Create a basic sentiment dictionary by merging the positive and negative terms in HOWNET, DLUTSD and NTUSD, and removing the duplicates.
- Step 2: Collect 1,411 online roadshow transcripts, 7,138 earnings conference call transcripts, 2,043 IPO prospectus reports, and 29,737 annual reports. Jieba (a Python package) is used to segment these documents to create a basic corpus.
- Step 3: Calculate the word frequency of every positive and negative terms in the basic corpus according to the basic sentiment dictionary created in Step 1. The terms with zero frequency are excluded. Terms that are irrelevant to the financial documents are manually excluded before the basic Chinese financial sentiment dictionary (CFSD 0.0) is created.
- Step 4: All the terms in CFSD 0.0 are from HOWNET, DLUTSD and NTUSD. Since these three dictionaries do not include some frequently used negative and positive terms in finance, 100 frequently used financial negative words and 100 positive words are manually added to produce the dictionary CFSD 0.1.
- Step 5: Gensim (a Python package) is used to transform the basic corpus into a word vector model. A word vector model is used to find out the first 50 similarities (or synonyms) for each term in the CFSD 0.1. CFSD 0.2 is created after we manually remove all the similar terms (or synonyms) that are irrelevant to the financial documents.
- Step 6: the CFSD 0.0, CFSD 0.1, and CFSD 0.2 are merged to remove the duplicates to get the CFSD.

There are 1,488 negative words and 1,107 positive words in the CFSD. Table 1 reports the constituion of HOWNET, DLUTSD, NTSUSD, and CFSD. It shows that CFSD contains much fewer positive and negative words than the other three general dictionaries. We translate all 2,595 words into English. Due to the vast differences between these two languages, some words cannot be meaningfully translated into English unless they are interpreted within a concrete context. In addition, some linguistic nuances of Chinese words can only be understood by a native speaker and cannot be precisely translated. Nonetheless, we list all words alphabetically according to their English translations (Part I and Part II, Appendix).

III. Applications of CFSD

For textual analysis in accounting and finance, researchers can apply the CFSD in examining news articles, the China Securities Regulatory Commission (CSRC, equivalent to the SEC in the U.S.) filings, stock exchange filings and comment letters, text from social media, such as weibo, China's Twitter, and so on.

Moreover, China's security markets and financial services platforms offer quite a few unique settings in which researchers can investigate some important and interesting research questions that are rarely studied due to lack of data. In this section, we briefly discuss two such settings that can help further our understanding of the role played by small investors: online earnings communication conferences (ECC) and online roadshows.

1. Online Earnings Communication Conferences (ECC)

In late 2005, the Shenzhen Stock Exchange of China mandated that each company listed on the Small and Medium Enterprise (SME) Board must hold an online ECC, within ten trading days of its annual report release. An ECC must have an open question and answer (Q&A) session, during which small investors can ask management any business-related questions and the management is obligated to answer them. In 2009, the China's hi-tech board - ChiNext imposed the same set of rules on its listed companies.

All online participants can see all the questions and answers in real-time during an ECC. Manual inspection of 50 ECC transcripts reveals that investor questions are very diverse. They cover all aspects of a company's business and more. Many questions deal with understanding the company's operations and accounting practice, including questions about local government subsidies, earnings forecast, related party transactions, major competitors, dividend payout, and so on. Some are about corporate culture, governance and social responsibility, such as minority shareholder protection, executive compensation and environmental protection. A handful questions are seemingly irrelevant to a company's operations but informative. For instance, a participant asked⁷, "I am a small retail investor. Can I visit your company? I called the number (for investor relationship) several times. No one answered, and I am very anxious." Quite a few questions are blunt and challenging. For example, one question was repeatedly asked at many an ECC, - "Who is the real boss in your company?" During the 2015 ECC of H.Brothers⁸, one asked its chairman, "Mr. Chairman, we as investors do not like your diplomatic rhetoric. How can you win back investors' confidence?" And the answer was, "Thank you for your advice." The funniest question⁹ goes to "Uncle Zhu, I have been crying and fainting in the bathroom. Shenzhen Government has imposed restrictions on real estate purchases. What is your take on this?"

This set of questions are quite different from those typically asked by professional analysts or large investors. The online IDs of these participants also tend to contain their cell phone numbers and personal touches, further suggesting that they are likely individual small investors.

Utilizing this unique setting, Bian, Jia, Li and Yan (2019) study the role of small investors in corporate governance by examining whether they ask value-relevant questions when interacting with managers. They find that market reaction and future firm performance are positively associated with the tone of small investors' questions. When managers dodge the questions from small investors, as measured using the degree of dissimilarity between investors' questions and mangers' answers, the market reacts less favorably and future performance becomes worse. The effects are stronger for firms with less analyst coverage. Overall, they find evidence indicating that small investors could ask value-relevant questions and supports the argument that small investors could contribute to corporate governance.

⁷ The question was asked during the 2007 ECC of Zhejiang NHU Co., Ltd. (stock ticker: 002001). The question was directed to Mr. Baiji Hu, Chairman of the company.

⁸ The company is Huayi Bros. Media Group, a leading entertainment group in China. Its stock ticker is 300027.

⁹ The question was asked during the 2015 ECC of Zhaoshang Shekou (stock ticker: 001979), a real estate company in Shenzhen. The question was directed to Mr. Wenkai Zhu, Deputy general manager of the company.

2. Online roadshows

According to the Notice on Promoting IPO Companies Online issued in 2001 by the CSRC, an IPO company must hold a roadshow online after the IPO offer price is set and before its share listing. Senior executives of the company, including its board chairperson, CEO, CFO, and the board secretary, and a representative from the lead underwriter must attend the roadshow that should last at least four hours. The following chart depicts a typical timeline for a Chinese company's IPO process.

The management of a soon-to-be public company in China, together with its underwriters, goes on a traditional roadshow to make its case to analysts and money managers and sets the IPO offer price afterwards. Before the IPO date, the company must hold an online roadshow, which includes a mandatory question and answer (Q&A) session. With an easy and free registration online, anyone can ask management any business-related questions online anonymously and the management is obligated to answer them. Since institutional investors who are interested in the company have just met with the management in person at private meetings during the traditional roadshow, there is no reason to believe that investors other than small investors would ask questions during the online roadshow. Online roadshows in China thus provide an ideal setting to study direct interaction between small investors and management, and its impact on firm value.

By examining textual transcripts of mandatory online roadshows in China, Bian et al. (2019) investigate the impact of direct interaction between small investors and management on firm value discovery. They find the first-day return is negatively associated with the management tone, which is highly correlated with the tone of the prospectus, indicating much information has been impounded in the offer price. They next show that as the degree of content similarity between questions and answers rises, the first-day return gets higher and post-IPO performance is better. Their study provides direct evidence that small investors can play a role in value discovery, if given opportunities to interact with management directly at a negligible cost.

IV. Conclusion

There exists a sizeable body of textual analysis literature. However, most studies examine textual transcripts in English. In this paper, we present detailed steps of constructing a new Chinese financial sentiment dictionary for textual analysis in accounting and finance. We provide the whole list of words in Appendix. We also discuss two unique settings in which researchers can investigate some important and interesting research questions that are rarely studied due to lack of data.
